The “HyperMotion” aspect provides fans with a truly authentic experience, reflecting the close physical contact between players that they see in real life. Players receive individual feedback during gameplay, such as how successful their ‘hits’ are and what actions were performed well on the ball. How “HyperMotion Technology” works, EA Sports has been working on “HyperMotion Technology” for the past three years. Former Creative Director Mark Longley led a team of engineers and scientists to build the ‘World Class Motion Capture Suit’ - the central component of “HyperMotion Technology” - and has provided his expertise to this FIFA milestone. The suit is the brainchild of Mark Longley, Creative Director at EA Sports and the engineer who helped create the popular ‘Skate Control’ and ‘Futsal Control’ variants which were included in FIFA 13. Mark’s ‘Jumping’ control was a milestone in the last generation of FIFA game controls, having demonstrated the implementation of next-gen player-coupling feedback and acceleration in game physics. When FIFA 17 launched, 3 million fans voted for a ‘Jumping’ control for FIFA. Now, more than two years later, EA Sports is celebrating the addition of the ‘HyperMotion’ control to the FIFA series. All 22 players of a real-life football match in motion-capture suits Between four and five motion capture suits are used by the game’s production team, with 1,000 movements collected per player. The suits are worn by the following players: - Gianluigi Buffon (Juventus, goalkeeper) - Daniel Agger (Liverpool, left back) - Serge Aurier (Toulouse, left back) - Benjamin Mendy (Toulouse, left wing) - Ederson Moraes (Porto, goalkeeper) - Filipe Luis (Atlético de Madrid, left wing) - Naldo (Manchester United, right back) - Sergio Romero (Inter Milan, right back) - Victor Lindelof (Benfica, centre back) - Luka Modrić (Ajax, centre back) - Joshua King (Freiburg, forward) - N’Golo Kant
