Obama's 2011 State of the Union address took a new tack: He sought to put the troubles of the economy into perspective. He called his proposals modest and, with one exception, pitched them as one-offs aimed at fixing specific problems. The exception was a plan to require wealthy Americans to pay an additional 10 percent in taxes. He pointed to a poll from CBS News that showed Americans support the idea. "If you want to understand why this new debate is so important," Obama said, "you only need to look at poll after poll. If you can't get Americans to support raising taxes on people making more than a quarter of a million dollars a year, then we've got a problem. That's the problem that I'm determined to solve." Obama ended the address with a simple admonition: "Tonight, I want to speak to all the people who did everything right and those who did everything wrong. I want to speak to the small business owners who worked hard and scrimped and saved, and the Americans who are running their businesses their way. And I'm here to tell you that the answer to our problems is not more government, it's not bigger government. It's the United States of America working together." Barack Obama addressed the full Congress and the nation in a State of the Union address last night, giving a glum update on the country's economy and calling for unity on the nation's legislative challenges. Watch out, though, for what appears to be a little suggestion from the president to Republicans in the audience. We see it in the video clip up top. After Obama says that he has not come up with his own ideas because "that's not what presidents do," he adds, "What I've said is, I have a specific set of
