Shutdown the system, switch the power off, and start it again. If the 0xc0000005 error still appears, then that may indicate that the installation medium is damaged and you will need to try installing Windows again from another installation medium. 1. Check the Windows log files. The Windows error log files are located at C:\Windows\system32\LogFiles. They might contain information on the source and solution of your problem. Simply press Windows key+R and type C:\Windows\system32\LogFiles in the search field to open the Open dialog box. Locate there the error.log file and then open it. You will probably find the error there. 2. Restart your computer. If you received the error message when your computer was running and if you have made the installation of the Windows updates, then the problem may be related to the Windows update. Make sure that the Windows update is not installed on your computer and you will not be prompted to install the update again when you restart your computer. If, however, you have already installed the Windows updates and the error message still occurs, you should try to re-install the update or rollback the update installation if there is any. Verify your Windows installation. Start your PC in safe mode. If the 0xc0000005 error is still there, try installing the Windows update again. If you received the error message when your computer was running and if you have made the installation of the Windows updates, then the problem may be related to the Windows update. Make sure that the Windows update is not installed on your computer and you will not be prompted to install the update again when you restart your computer.
