In a world where climate change, aging infrastructure, terrorism, and pandemics are all possible sources of supply chain vulnerability, policymakers have a duty to think long term and to strive for a logistics system that can withstand any combination of those vulnerabilities in the absence of a single source of supply. In the case of a conflict that causes supply chain disruptions, the PLAN cannot rely on oil imports through the Strait of Malacca or other outlets in Southeast Asia or the Indian Ocean. According to Chinese analysts, the Seychelles and Madagascar have a strategic interest in assisting in this contingency. However, foreign policy goals are not the only factor determining import routings. The opposite of wishing for a Chinese blue-water navy is to clearly understand that the PRC will likely fill coastal zones with submarine-launched stealth missiles, stealthy aircraft, and hypersonic weapons, provide intermittent naval formations with its best-sustained operational capabilities, and transform its global carrier battle group into a large anti-surface warfare force. U.S. and allied planners and policymakers must prepare for both; an all-out war with the People's Army Navy is very unlikely but still remains a possibility. More important, by using these tools, the CCP is able to effectively stay ahead of the policymakers—and even the policymakers themselves—while, at the same time, appear to make progress in its aims. Our goal has been to provide a foundation for understanding China's foreign policy from the perspective of its political management, and to use this information to inform policy makers, journalists, and analysts about the causes, consequences, and possibilities for non-US policy engagement and conflict with China.

Von Hollen even hopes that companies can send their product designs through the Ultimaker consortium or other 3D printing businesses so they can have access to the additive manufacturing technology. Essentially, someone else would help to make the design and help with the process, eliminating the cost. 3D rendering software such as PTC Creo, Autodesk Inventor, and SolidWorks, are also among the items that are easily accessible in the module.
